Were the Merchant's Helrs After the Insurance Money?

The trial of the sult of Samuel H. Millard against Mrs. Frances G. Brigham, before Judge Newburger, in the Mr. I City Court, has brought out some re- city. markable facts in regard to the private affairs of the late Levi M. Bates, the drygoods merchant, who was drowned in the East River while out rowing with his son

MRS. F. G. BRIGHAM

The action is brought to recover a 10 per cent. commission on an insurance licy for $20,000 on the life of Mr. Bates. which Mr. Bates had made in favor of Mrs. Brigham, who lives at 312 West One. John R. Abney, a lawyer, started in to give a history of his connection with the case, when Lawyer Birdseye objected that he was not testifying according to the rules of evicence.

"That's a very difficult thing for any mas to do," remarked Judge Newberger.
"Yes, but he needn't make a atump speech," put in Mr. Birdseye.

The point of Mr. Abney's testimony was that he had been retained by Mrs.
Brigham to collect the policy. Some time afterwards Millard called upon him and told him that he could not recover on the policy. He wanted Mrs. Brigham to assign the policy to the children of Mr. Bates for $5,000.

This Mr. Abney said he refused to do, as he was convinced that the policy was all right, and could be collected. Millard called upon him several times after that and tried to induce him to advise Mrs. Brigham to transfer the policy to the Bates heirs. Finally Millard gave up the attempt and said to the witness:

"Weil, if you can't do that. I would rather see Mrs. Brigham get the money than the insurance company, and I will help you all I can."

The witness declared that Millard never did anything towards collecting the molecular and said anything towards collecting the molecular and said anything towards collecting the molecular and did not even elve him any
